BRIEF ITEMS.

E. T. Emerson, of Los Angeles, was in the city several days this week.

Sheriff Barnett came in from the north on Tuesday evening delayed train.

Lie. J. H. Cardon, the bright Hermosillo lawyer, was registered at the Montezuma this week.

Mrs. M. H. Walker, of Dallas, Tex., is visiting in the border city. She is at the Montezuma hotel.

Several big mining deals are on the tapis in Nogales, whereby large sums of money will change hands.

Mr. and Mrs. L. B. Fleischer have been spending the week in Tucson. Mr. Fleischer is serving on the jury.

The pay car came in from the north Monday night and returned Tuesday morning after making the railroad boys glad.

J. W. Whitlow, the Florence cattleman, accompanied by his niece, Miss Lola Davis, has been a visitor in the border city the past week, a guest of the popular Montezuma hotel.

Pete Trellis has accepted a position with a mining company in the Montezuma district, Sonora. We congratulate the company in securing the services of a man like Mr. Trellis.

The south bound passenger train from the north was about ten hours late Tuesday on account of a little wreck on the north end. Nobody was hurt and small damage was done to the road.

A number of parties have been in Nogales the past week looking after ranch property. We have no doubt there are many bargains in land to be had in this vicinity and would suggest that persons having such advertise same for the benefit of prospective buyers.

Pedro Trellis returned from Tucson last Wednesday after a three month's sojourn in the old pueblo. Pete says Tucson is a good town but Nogales is better and he is willing to take his chances here in the future. Mr. Trellis is a first-class book keeper and a gentleman who has hosts of friends who are glad he has returned to the border city.

A WOMAN'S WISH.

A Strange Death Overtakes a Former Resident of Phoenix.

Word has lately been received of the death near Chillicothe, Mo., of J. F. McCoy, a former resident of Phoenix, a wealthy former stockman and money lender. McCoy came to Phoenix about nine years ago with his family on account of the ill health of his son. He lived in one of Dr. Crowell's houses near the corner of Monroe and Fourth street. He returned to Missouri six years ago. His death came about in a most singular manner. He held a mortgage upon the farm of a man named Bateman. Bateman was hopelessly involved. McCoy long after the mortgage fell due threatened foreclosure unless the property were transferred to him by deed. Bateman agreed to make the transfer and a few days ago the parties met to execute it. The deed was made and signed by Bateman and his wife. The woman did not understand precisely what she was doing. When the deed was handed to McCoy he held it up and calling Mrs. Bateman's attention to the internal revenue stamps, asked, "Did you ever see these before?" "Yes," she replied absently, though she never had seen them. It was remembered afterward that her mind was terribly perturbed and that though she knew the effect of the document, could realize it only imperfectly.

But soon after she returned home the matter was cleared up and she knew that the farm was gone forever. She fell into a convulsion which was followed by another and another. The last one passed away about midnight. She lay in intense mental suffering, thinking only of the lost home. "I wish that I might never see his (meaning McCoy's) living face."

She never did, nor did any one else, for McCoy died in the night. He had retired in apparently excellent health. His wife said that shortly before midnight he arose and in reply to his wife's inquiry, he said he had not slept and was going for a drink of water. He returned to bed and his wife immediately fell asleep. When she awoke a dead man was at her side. From the appearance of the body he must have died at almost the same moment that Mrs. Bateman uttered her blighting wish. The messenger of death was obedient and swift, more responsive to the wish than the leaden ball to the pressure of the trigger.—Republican.

FROM PUERTO RICO.

An Old Yumate Describes the Beauties of the Island.

From a letter written by D. M. Field, who is now in Puerto Rico, to a friend in Yuma, the following extracts are taken:

"I came here as a packer with Gen. Miles on August 2, 1898, and am so well pleased with the island, its climate and prospects that I shall try to make a home here. The climate here is one continual late in the spring and early in the fall. The temperature ranges from fifty to ninety degrees. The rainfall is about two feet per annum, the principal precipitation being in the months of April and May, August and October, with intermittent showers dispersed throughout the year. Irrigation is resorted to on the sugar plantations, yet for fruit culture I don't think it an absolute necessity. The wind blows steadily the year around.

"There is not a fruit farm on the island, except a frail attempt at one near Mayaguez, on the western coast. All other fruits raised here are gathered from seedling trees, as they have retained their identity through the aid of nature alone. Cultivation, propagation, pruning and fertilizing are unknown contingencies, yet one sees trees everywhere loaded with large, well-formed delicious fruit, that elicit the admiration of orange and lemon growers in any man's land. The only objection I find to the fruits here is that they are thoroughly filled with seeds.

"This is a good country for men with money who are able to buy large tracts of land, as it is mostly held in extensive possessions. Labor is cheap, 30 cents per day in American money or 50 cents in provincial coin, is paid the average laborer.

"The sugar plantations employ nine-tenths negroes, while the coffee farms are supplied in about the same proportion with native laborers. Sugar is planted chiefly on the level lands along the coast, while the interior or mountain sections are devoted to coffee.

"There is more misery, apparent and actual, to the square inch here than any other spot upon this hemisphere known to mortal gaze. Morality is a word
